The criticism of religion is, therefore, in embryo, the criticism of that vale of tears of which religion is the halo." (Marx 1975f) Thus Marx makes it clear why a critique of political economy must at the same time be a science: commodity production meets real needs, it is a necessary illusion, an illusion with real content; it is the mode of existence of bourgeois society.

From Marx and Engels' materialist perspective, these contradictions and transformations are part of nature itself. In the world of science, new discoveries were taking place that increasingly confirmed Marx and Engels' dialectical worldview and calling into question the mechanical approach put forward by previous materialists.

Through the essential inconsistencies in this science, Marx sought to reveal the contradictions of those social forms. The critique of this bourgeois science thus showed that the 'integument' could be broken through by the socialist revolution, to open the way for a life 'worthy of our human nature' (Marx, 1978 Vol.III: 959).
